

Editorial Paintings

Art With A New Direction

Press Release

February 29, 2004
PR No. 1/2004

Editorial Paintings announces a new round of editorial paintings on view at www.editorialpaintings.com, which was launched on the worldwide web on September 4, 2003 with a gallery of 12 acrylic paintings and accompanying text.

The paintings and text are aimed at four institutions of American society that have failed in their duties and responsibilities to serve the American people: politics, government, corporations and the news media.

These institutions have evolved over time and were designed to act as a check and balance toward one another to prevent, respond to, and report on tyranny, incompetence, and corruption in order to maintain a civil and democratic society free of corrupt influences.

However, at the dawn of the 21st Century, historic events provided the opportunity to witness the fact that these institutions have been working, and continue to work, for their own self-interest in the form of influence peddling, theft, fraud, and inaccurate reporting of important information and facts.

As a result of the Presidential election of 2000, the attack of September 11, 2001, the Enron and Worldcom scandals, as well as, the current war and continuing business scandals, we have witnessed nothing less than corrupt and failed political leadership, insufficient corporate accountability, inept reporting by the news media, and incompetent government officials.

We are living in a time of extraordinary events coupled with untrustworthy and inadequate leadership. Editorial Paintings will voice its opinion on the events of our time in both images and words.

For more information, you may contact Martin Ostrye at artist@editorialpaintings.com.